Increasingly, electronic payment methods are becoming an alternative to cash and credit cards and other physical payment methods. While the growth of electronic payment methods is a benefit to consumers and to the economy as a whole, such methods can also be subject to many drawbacks. Examples include the possibility of fraud and the need for a trusted agent to complete transactions. While new technologies such as chips and wireless chips are being developed that will reduce some of the shortcomings, there remain many challenges in making the Internet a secure and viable alternative to cash and credit cards, especially in the field of recurring payments. Electronic money has a lot of promise. The Internet and other digital technologies offer new possibilities. Recurring payments, especially in recurring billing services, offer a compelling way to gain customers and increase revenue. But they also represent a substantial challenge for merchants. In particular, electronic money has the potential to be the most convenient, easiest-to-use, and secure payment system available. Yet, it also has the potential to be very costly to both businesses and consumers. Those problems are especially acute for recurring payments. These payments provide the most favorable return-on-investment for merchants, but also provide the most risk of customer dissatisfaction. With more and more consumers using electronic payments for recurring billing, the merchant's risk for customer dissatisfaction is growing. The fundamental issue is that customers are asked to commit to a long-term relationship with the merchant and that customer will want to be in control of this commitment. The customer should be able to modify the relationship at any time and choose to do so without risking penalty or cancellation of services or diminished value of service. Under existing methods of electronic payment, a customer orders a service such as a payment for an electronic service. The customer receives a conventional piece of paper indicating the payment is complete. The customer then "locks in" to that payment for the service to be provided by the merchant. No way is presently available for the customer to modify the relationship or payment commitment. The customer can cancel and receive a refund, but there are costs associated with d0c515b9f4

Well, I took some rides yesterday with my girlfriend. The club VRA is alive and well in the bay area. I took the road tour around the lights out past the Golden Gate, around the water and up into the mountains. So nice to have the road. Man, I wish people would get around to building those Pan Am Highway type roads. It'd be great having a one day ride that cut down the burn, and have a smooth highway with room to move along it. Imagine if you got into a car with other riders doing 70-90mph. The freeway like effects... As for the rides...Do you all just get on and ride with the traffic (especially new riders on that road)? I mean, the road is a very curvy / very scary experience for a new rider. Wow...I thought a "bad ass" club would have a facility of some sort in back of a bar that people just showed up to ride.
