Chapter 3: The Lips of The Wind It started with a scraping sound from the roof. The birds on my bedroom ceiling began to flap madly as they sensed my distress. It was muffled but clear and distinct; one of the many sounds that masked the echo of voices coming from outside. Now that had to be them. "I could have gone for a nice, fresh soulful bubble bath." "Bubble bath?" "Yes, or snorkeling, do you want to come?" "No." "Oh, that's fine then." "Hmmm..." "Have you had dinner?" "No." "Oh, good, that would taste lovely." "There is no need to go into my room with a scowl." "Oh, really? How about dinner? Come on...let's go." "I said no." "You're not budging on this, are you?" "Yes." "No! I'll drag you by the hair if I have to!" "Well, don't bother. I'm leaving." "Oh, fine...bye then." Silence and calm now...it was so tranquil. I sat upright, mindlessly brushing my hair. Then I heard the crash. That was when I jumped out of bed. "What was that?" I squeaked, as I hopped out of my room. "Sara?" Now I heard them! I looked around cautiously to see who it was. "Sara?" I tried to see who it was but there was no one there. "Don't try to run away, Sara, we will catch you." I looked around again and realised that there was no one there. Then it dawned on me! It was the three spirits that had haunted my dreams! They were the three that I had fought before. I was trapped in the "House of Suffering" after all. I was pretty sure my best defence was to hide. I crouched behind a pillar, with my back to the wall. "Boo!" one of them said. I squealed. "You said 'Boo' and ran away

The Sankt Lützamäki neighborhood in Kreuzberg, Berlin was built in the early 1900s, primarily as a Polish working-class district. In 1913, large proportions of the neighborhood were inhabited by Poles, but by the mid-1920s, the proportion of the population that was Polish fell to less than 10 percent. As the Germans became more assertive during the Weimar Republic, the Polonians of the neighborhood were pressured to give up their German citizenship or be forced to leave the area. After Hitler came to power in 1933, the Nazi-run government began to expel Poles from Berlin in a so-called "flight into the West." What Was It Like in the Gulag Archipelago by Aleksandr Solzhenitsyn? One of the central problems with the research of totalitarianism and Stalinism, is that so little of the experience in the Gulag Archipelago was documented. There were no grand narratives to compare to the Kolyma Tales or the memoirs of survivors. In fact, according to Solzhenitsyn, no such memoirs existed; in the camps, there was no private space and no private property. Solzhenitsyn recalled, "In the camp itself there was no way of making [a memoir] plausible or convincing." So, in order to fill the gap, we are left with his writings and those of other witnesses, which left an important gap because Solzhenitsyn did not do a lot of research, did not interview other prisoners, and did not testify in court. What Were the Conditions like in Nazi Concentration Camps? The Nazis were acutely aware of the power of literature in dictating what people believe. The Nazis used the newspapers and books they took from the people, promoting them in special camps and then imprisoning and murdering those who questioned or criticized them. As a result, the public grew to view the Nazis as the new guardians of morality, religion and knowledge. It was at this point, people began to fear what might happen if anyone criticized the new order. Why Were Collaborators Sent to Concentration Camps? The Nazis needed a way to punish people who fought against the Nazis or denounced them. Collaborators were punished by sending them to concentration camps where they would remain for the rest of their lives. If they were Jews, they were forced to wear a yellow star. These people who collaborated with the Nazis were considered traitors and the least important among

Many questions and ideas about customization came to light right from the moment the game was released. Pergolas and sidewalks? What about a fenced in front yard? The sky looks good(ish). Probably going to do like they did in Faerie Invasion(2012), where the tree branches are represented by the different areas in the MMORPG and only to touch one will awaken it, but the flowers don't look realistic nor do I see flowers when picking one up. Maybe make it a one step process? Plants are kept in big plot and planted at will. The world is a large map and you can roam around in your avatar. Aren't the plants held in meshes? The credit for the original concept can be found in Neon Bloom's blog post, which was at first a geode gallery, then an airplane hangar. From what I can gather this world will be significantly bigger than the one in Epoch/Faerie Invasion. Despite having been released a month ago (from memory), most of the questions are from a month before. EDIT: And to top it off there's a few green items lying around. Seriously who decided this was a nice and green pixel graphics? Really, I've only seen an orange pixel dragon in other games. When I saw my first NPC I thought to myself, hello, a human. Further EDIT: After a couple more renderings, we now have the first ever Neko Screenshot! I've learned today that there's a custom zbrush material made to the specifications of the new model in the Cat Apocalypse. Apparently it has all the main parts you need to make a cat face. There's also a few other materials, like one for sewing/clothes. Now I think there's enough material and hard to leave alone, what do you guys think? I say just use the zbrush materials and put some meshes in there and you got yourself a cat. I'm sure as Hell no one will look twice at a chibi-cat. Either way its a cute video If the
