Accuracy of the guidance of implantation of IOLs in surgery. To evaluate the influence of the alignment pattern of the capsulorhexis on the accuracy of implantation of the implantable lens. Fifty-three eyes of 53 patients with a mean age of 56.5 years (range 37 to 78 years) were included in this prospective study. Alignment of the capsulorhexis was based on the position of the haptics of the IOL in relation to the zonules in the bag anterior to the IOL. One eye with a history of macular degeneration (group A) and another with a history of intraoperative complications (group B) were compared. The capsulorhexis was decentered in three eyes (5%) in group A and in five eyes (10%) in group B. One patient in group B showed a significant reduction of foveal thickness by more than 20% after IOL implantation (decentered capsulorhexis). The accuracy of capsulorhexis in relation to the implanted IOL is an important parameter for the implantation of IOLs. After preoperative manual correction of a decentered capsulorhexis, the accuracy of the implantation of the IOL will be improved. Newlyweds Joan and Robert Adams are set to welcome their first child together, but the couple have been hit by a devastating setback in their dream of becoming parents. The theatre couple, who are engaged, had been hoping to produce a child together, but doctors have discovered that Joan is suffering from a rare genetic condition that could leave her infertile. We report a case of hyperbaric oxygen therapy for a 4-year-old girl who suffered from brain damage following cardiac surgery. The patient presented with impaired consciousness and decreased level of consciousness approximately 4 months after surgery. High-resolution CT scans revealed subarachnoid hemorrhage and intraventricular hemorrhage in the left ventricle. Computed tomography angiography showed no findings of aneurysms, so the cause of hemorrhage was considered to be a rupture of an intracranial aneurysm. After admission, she was treated with hyperbaric oxygen therapy. The results of brain CT scans after treatment improved her neurological symptoms.
