Juho Kangasniemi, professor of mathematics at the University of Turku in Finland, and his colleagues have gone one step further: They've transformed the 37-year-old algorithm into a working program that can live with the speed of a computer processor. "A program on a single processor that finds a solution in days, which was thought impossible, is now within the reach of software developers," says Kangasniemi. "But," he adds, "there are still many obstacles, and the programme is at the stage where it's usable for real-world applications." The techniques used in the new algorithm could find applications outside of mathematics as well, Kangasniemi says, because they deal with a problem that many people experience on a daily basis. "At least once a week or month we have to do a very simple calculation - such as the number of bread rolls in a bakery - for which a human mathematician would have to spend hours calculating the answer," says Kangasniemi. Mathematicians have a knack for creating new algorithms that give highly precise and elegant answers to complex mathematical problems.
